This timely book summarises a South Korean commission that looked at the country's future, using 2030 as a fiducial point. Many trends with Korean society are discussed. Take the declining birth rate. Surely a hallmark of a successful and rapid industrialisation. But this of course means an aging society, the implications of which might include a fall in savings rates as future elderly draw down their savings. Another trend which the commission finds disturbing is an increased polarisation in wealth. Currently, the nation has a relatively egalitarian distribution of income and wealth. However it is expected that income inequality will rise, leading to possible tensions between social classes. There is a search for a so-called new paradigm. Where South Korea continues to grow, especially in the face of competition from lower wage countries like China and Vietnam. The hardest topic is clearly reunification. Pious hopes are expressed that this be peaceful. But even in this happy case, the subsequent cost of assimilating a poverty stricken north might take another generation of effort.
